How to get a job with no experience? Guide from Interview Penguin

Step 1: Assess what you can offer to the employers

Think about your strengths, your talents and skills. Can you speak any foreign languages? Are you skilled with a computer program, one that not many people are skilled with? Or do other people enjoy talking to you? Perhaps you are in a great shape, ready to handle a physically demanding job that most people won't handle.

Many people have heard nothing but insults in their childhood. But forget what your family, or teachers, or friends said to you. There is a potential in you. You have a lot to offer to the employers.

Step 2: Connect your strengths with the job offers

So here you are, with the list of your strengths, and perhaps also with the list of the things you enjoy doing. It is a best possible start for your job search—to know your qualities, to know what makes you happy in your daily life.

Look at the list right now, and try to connect your strengths with jobs.

Step 3: Submit some job applications, make your skills stand out

The key is to show the employer the truth. Tell them you have no experience, but show them other reason to give you a chance in an interview with their company.

You have the right personality for the job, and that you can quickly learn how to do it well—these are your strengths.

Step 4: Prepare for an interview in a best possible way

Once you are invited for an interview, you have the same chances as everyone else. Everything starts from zero, and at the end of the day, one person will sign a job contract. Will it be you?

On the day of the interview, it doesn't matter who is the most, or the least experienced job candidate in the room. What matters is who can convince the interviewers of the value they can bring to the company, of their motivation, and of the right attitude to the job.

What matters is how you answer their questions, how you conduct yourself in the room, and if you manage to build a good connection with the person who sits at the other side of the table...
